BACKGROUND

Built in 1962, for the G. Whatley & Zn. Naaldwijk company, the MV Altea was originally called the Westland Producer and used as a general cargo vessel.

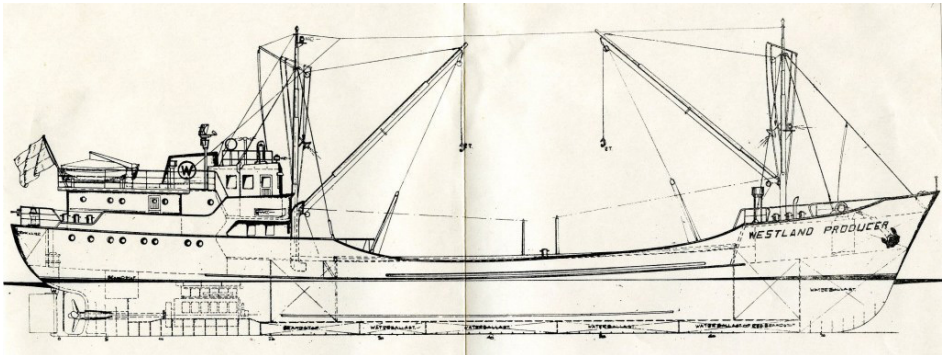

Sheerness became a regular port of call for the Westland Producer sailing in two or three times a week with a cargo from the Netherlands. There was one main problem for the shipping company; they had no return cargo, a problem that they quickly wanted resolved. The owner of the Westland Producer was at this time prepared to build a second vessel if sufficient return cargo would be available. The return cargo was found in the form of the live cattle trade. Contracts were signed and the Sheerness Harbour Company arranged the lairage. The second vessel Westland Trader was built and the business could begin.

In November 1963 she had a collision in the Thames Estuary and was decommissioned until 1964 when she was was commissioned for business once again. In 1967 the vessel was rebuilt and lengthened to 56.86m, GRT: 499 and DWT: 549 by de Groot & van Viet. This rebuild was to adapt the vessel and make it suitable for the transport of vegetable containers.

In 1972 the vessel changed name to Vita Nova when a change of hands meant the vessel was re-registered in Panama City. It continued its use as a cargo vessel until 1987, when the vessel changed owners and names again. The vessel was renamed Moby Dick and converted for recreational and sport purposes. In 1989 the final change of hands and name took place. The Opinia Shipping Company took control of the vessel and changed the name of the vessel to MV Altea. The home port of the vessel was also changed to San Lorenzo, Honduras

In October 1989 the MV Altea was stopped in the English Channel for being used in an attempt to smuggle 17 tonnes of illegal substances into the United Kingdom. The vessel was seized and taken to Dover. In 1990 the Altea was moved down a route that it previously have travelled so regularly when in use as cargo vessel in the 1960s. This route was along the River Medway to Rochester where the Altea became a training vessel for the war on drugs. In 1991 the vessel was towed to Liverpool and imposed. The MV Altea continued its use a training vessel for the United Kingdom's HM Customs. In 2004 the MV Altea became no longer registered.

The vessel has consistently been maintained with approximately £100,000 being spent. The most recent maintenance works were carried out in February 2013, totaling OVER £67,000. This maintenance work included a high pressure wash to the underwater area, hard scrape and remove marine growth. Further to this the surfaces were mechanically prepared for painting. 2 x 40% touch up coats were applied along with 2 full coats to underwater areas. The topside surfaces received similar treatment with 2 x 20% touch ups and 2 full coats. The draft marks were also repainted. In addition to the painting electrical testing and repairs were carried out throughout the vessel along with health and safety signage fitted.

Sunday July 28th 1968 was a very memorable day for photographer Tom Murray as he unexpectedly participated in what was the last ever official publicity and promotional shoot of the Beatles as a group. The day is now famously known worldwide as the 'Mad Day Out' summer of 1968.

The day resulted in what is considered by Beatle's experts to be the finest collection of colour images of the 'fab four' in 1968. The images were available for Beatles collectors to purchase back between 2006 to 2009 in 3 volumes. The museum quality, archival giclée prints were only available as 413mm x 610mm (17" by 24") colour images, each signed and numbered, with a certificate of authenticity.

The images were each limited to only 195 copies and sold separately through a large number of bespoke UK galleries. As such, it was therefore extremely difficult to compile a full collection and it is believed that there are only 3 complete sets of all 23 pictures of which this is one.

This is a unique opportunity to own a complete piece of music history.
